

*“Welcome back to Day 11 of our 21-Days English Challenge.

Today, we will listen to a beautiful and inspiring story...

the story of a young girl who followed her dreams with courage and hope.

This girl's two dreams

First MBBS Doctor

And the second dream is to go to Dubai.

In this video, you will learn new English sentences, useful vocabulary,

and natural expressions that you can use in daily life.

The girl in this story will speak in her own voice and tell us how she faced problems, how her family supported her,

and how she finally reached her goals.

So, relax, listen carefully, and enjoy this simple and powerful story.

Let's begin the journey...

This is the story of Emma.”

Hello everyone...

My name is Emma, and today I want to share something very personal with you.

This is the story of my life, my dreams, and the people who helped me become who I am.

I am 25 years old, and I live in a small and peaceful town in the United Kingdom.

Our house is very simple. my parents and my younger brother.

We did not have a lot of money, but we had something more important—

we had love, support, and a strong family bond.

From the outside, my life looked very normal.
I went to school, did my homework, helped my mother in the kitchen,
and played in the garden with my brother.

But inside my heart,
I always felt something bigger.
A small voice inside me kept whispering:

“Emma, you are meant for something special.
You must follow your dreams.”

I did not know what my dreams really were at that time, but I knew they were important.
I knew they would shape my future.

As I grew older,
my dreams slowly became clearer,
like a picture that starts to show little by little.
And two dreams stayed with me for many years—
one dream was about my career, and the other was about my heart.

My first dream was to become a doctor,
a person who can help others and give hope to families.
This dream changed the direction of my life.

My second dream was to visit Dubai, a place I had seen only in pictures but felt connected to as if I had known it for a long time.

These two dreams became the center of my life.
They guided me,
pushed me,
and gave me reasons to work hard every single day.

But dreams never grow alone.
Behind every dream,
there is a story.
There is struggle.
There is sacrifice.
And there is family.

Before my dreams became real,
life tested me again and again.
But each time I fell,
my family lifted me up.
Each time I was scared,
they stood beside me.

So today, before I tell you about my journey,
I want you to know something:

I am not special because I achieved my dreams.
I am special because I never stopped believing in them.

And now...
let me take you to the moment when my first dream truly began.

MY FIRST DREAM

My first dream began when I was very young, but at that time, I did not know that this moment would change my whole life.

I was only 10 years old when my mother became very sick.

It was a cold winter evening.

The sky was dark,

and the wind was blowing strongly outside our house.

Inside, my mother was lying on the sofa,

holding her stomach and breathing with difficulty.

I had never seen her like that before.

She was always the strongest person in our home—

the one who smiled every morning,

the one who cooked for us,

the one who made everything feel safe.

But that night, she looked weak, and that scared me more than anything.

My father quickly took her to the hospital.

I sat next to her on the hospital bed, holding her hand tightly and trying not to cry.

My heart was beating fast,

and I kept asking myself:

“Will she be okay? What is happening?”

Then something happened...

something that changed me forever.

A woman doctor walked into the room.

Her face was calm,

her voice was soft,

and her eyes were full of kindness.

She didn't rush.

She didn't panic.
She spoke gently,
as if she understood our fear.

She checked my mother carefully, explained the problem to my father in simple words,
and then turned toward me.

She smiled and said,
“Don't worry, sweetheart.
Your mother will be fine.
We are here to take care of her.”

That one sentence
felt like a warm blanket on a cold night.
Her words made me feel safe,
even though I was still scared inside.

In that moment,
something powerful happened inside my heart.
It was like a light switching on.

I looked at her and thought:

“I want to be like her.
I want to help people like she helps them.
I want to be a doctor.”

This was the beginning of my first dream.

The Dream That Grew With Me

After my mother recovered, life went back to normal,

but my dream stayed with me.

When I went to school,
I started reading more science books.
I became curious about the human body—
how the heart beats,
how the brain works,
how medicine can save lives.

When other children went outside to play, sometimes I stayed inside and watched videos about hospitals, nurses, doctors, and patient stories.

My teachers noticed that I loved biology.
They said,
“Emma, you can become something great.
Keep studying. Keep going.”

And I listened to them.

My dream and I grew together.
Every year,
I understood more clearly that I didn’t want to be a doctor only for myself—I wanted to be a doctor because I never wanted another child to feel the fear I felt that night in the hospital.

I wanted to be the person who brings hope,
who calms families,
who protects life.

The Hard Work Behind My Dream

When I reached high school,
I realized that dreaming was easy, but becoming a doctor was not.

Biology, chemistry, physics—these subjects were difficult.
Sometimes I understood everything.
Sometimes I understood nothing.
There were nights when I cried quietly because the homework felt impossible.

But every time I felt tired,
I remembered the woman doctor who helped my mother.
I remembered how safe she made us feel.

And I told myself:
“Emma, you must continue.
This is your dream.
This is your purpose.”

So I worked harder.
I woke up early.
I studied during lunch breaks.
I stayed up late reading thick books with long, complicated words.

Slowly... very slowly...
I began to understand more.
My marks improved.

My confidence grew.
My teachers supported me.
My family believed in me.

And my dream became stronger than ever.

The Day My Dream Took Its First Step

Then came the most important day of my young life—
the day I received my MBBS acceptance letter.

I still remember that morning.
My hands were shaking.
My mother stood beside me,
holding her breath.

When I opened the envelope and read the word “Congratulations...”,
I felt my whole world light up.

I started crying.
My mother hugged me tightly.
My father smiled with pride, something he didn’t show often.

I realized then:

A dream becomes real the moment you refuse to give up.

That day, I didn’t only get into medical school...
I stepped onto the path that would shape the rest of my life.

My first dream had finally begun.

MY FAMILY'S ROLE IN MY JOURNEY

When people look at me today,
they often say,
“Emma, you are strong.”
But what they don't see is this:

My strength came from my family.
My confidence came from my family.
And my dreams grew because my family held them for me.

I was never alone in my journey.
At every step—
every success,
every failure,
every fear—
my family stood beside me like a silent wall of support.

My Mother — My First Teacher of Kindnesses

My mother is a gentle woman with warm eyes.
She doesn't speak loudly, but her silence always carries love.

When I started dreaming about becoming a doctor,
she didn't laugh,
she didn't doubt.
Instead, she said something I will never forget:

“Emma, if this is what your heart wants,
I will stand with you.”

She supported me in ways that felt small at the time but meant the world to me.

When I studied late at night,
she quietly placed a cup of tea on my desk without saying a word—
just a small smile
to remind me that she believed in me.

On exam days,
she woke up early to make breakfast
so I wouldn't leave the house hungry.
Before I walked out of the door,
she always touched my head gently and said:

“Go, Emma.
Do your best.
I am praying for you.”

I didn't realize it then,
but her prayers carried me through many difficult days.

My Father — The Silent Strength Behind Me

My father is a quiet man.
He doesn't talk much about emotions,
but he shows his love through actions.

When I told him I wanted to become a doctor,
his eyes softened,
and he smiled in a way I rarely saw.

He worked extra hours at his job to buy me books,
pay my class fees,
and make sure I had everything I needed.

He never complained.
Not once.

Sometimes I used to find him sitting at the dining table late at night, calculating expenses,
looking tired.

When I asked him,
“Dad, are we okay?”

He always said:
“Yes, Emma.
Just focus on your studies.
I will take care of the rest.”

His confidence gave me courage.
His sacrifices gave my dream wings.

My Younger Brother — My Quiet Supporter

My younger brother may not say it, but he has always been proud of me.

When I studied at home,
he tried not to make noise.
He walked slowly,
kept the TV volume low, and waited until I was free to tell me anything important.

He even helped with small chores to reduce my workload.

Sometimes he sat next to me while I studied,
reading his own books,
just to give me company.

Those small moments made me feel less alone during stressful days.

The Hard Time That Tested All of Us

When my father lost his job,
everything changed.

Bills became heavier.
Money became tight.
Our home felt different—quieter, heavier, worried.

I saw my mother trying to save every penny.
I saw my father feeling guilty even though it wasn't his fault.

I saw my little brother pretending to be brave
so that our parents wouldn't worry about him too.

During this time,
I thought about giving up my dream
so I could work full-time and help them.

But my mother held my hands and said:

“Emma, your dream is our dream.
We will face difficulties together,
but you must not stop now.”

Her words were like a light in darkness.

So I found a part-time job and continued my studies at the same time.

We all adjusted.
We all sacrificed.
We all suffered a little.

But we also grew closer.
We learned to support each other in ways we never had before.

That difficult time showed me how strong my family really was.

My Success Became Their Victory

When my MBBS acceptance letter arrived, my family cried more than I did.

My mother hugged me tightly
and whispered:

“This is the reward for your hard work and our prayers.”

My father smiled proudly
and said:

“We did it, Emma... together.”

My brother jumped around the room
as if he had been accepted into medical school himself.

At that moment,
I realized something beautiful:

No dream is truly personal.
A dream becomes powerful when a family stands behind it.

Everything I achieved is because they believed in me even when I doubted myself.

The Heart of My Journey

Today, when people say,
“Emma, you are strong,”
I smile gently because I know the truth:

My real strength is my family.

They lifted me
when I fell.

They encouraged me when I was tired.

They held my dreams
when they were too heavy for me.

And for the rest of my life,

I will carry their love like a shield around my heart.

MY MBBS LIFE & STRUGGLES — EXTENDED

When I finally entered medical school,
I felt like I had stepped into a completely new world.
A world full of dreams...
but also a world full of challenges.

I still remember my first day of MBBS.
I walked into the big university building, holding my backpack tightly,
my heart beating fast with excitement and fear.

There were students everywhere—
some confident,
some nervous,
some looking lost just like me.

The hallways smelled like new books,
fresh notebooks,
and a little bit like disinfectant.
It felt like a place where serious dreams lived.

I told myself:

“Emma, this is it.
Your journey starts today.”

The Reality of MBBS

Before joining medical school,
I thought MBBS was just about studying biology.

But soon I learned that MBBS is about:

- early mornings
- long lectures
- heavy textbooks
- endless notes
- hospital rounds
- late-night study sessions
- and very little sleep

Sometimes the textbooks were bigger than my confidence.
Sometimes the lectures felt longer than my patience.

But I kept going.

Long Nights & Tired Eyes

There were nights when I studied until 3 a.m.
My room was quiet,
my lamp was the only source of light,
and my eyes burned from reading too many pages.

On some nights, I felt confused.
I read one paragraph ten times and still understood nothing.

I whispered to myself:

“Emma, you can do this.
Just one more page...
just one more chapter.”

And somehow,
I always found enough strength to continue.

The Subjects That Broke Me

Every medical student has a subject they fear.
For me, it was biochemistry.

Those long chemical names, formulas, pathways—
they made me feel small and helpless.

I failed one of my quizzes.
It was the first time I had ever failed anything.

I went to the bathroom and cried quietly.
I felt like I wasn't good enough.

But the next morning,
I woke up, washed my face,
and opened the same book again.

Because dreams don't grow in comfort.
Dreams grow in struggle.

My First Day in the Hospital

Then came one of the most important experiences—our first hospital rotation.

I wore my white coat for the first time, and it felt heavy on my shoulders—
not because of the fabric, but because of the responsibility.

We walked into the ward.
There were patients everywhere.
Some looked tired,
some scared,
some hopeful.

I watched the senior doctor speak to a patient with so much care and confidence.
I thought:

“One day, I want to speak like that.
One day, I want to help like that.”

That day, I understood
why I had chosen this path.

MBBS is not only hard for the brain.
It is hard for the heart too.

There were days I felt exhausted—mentally, physically, emotionally.

There were days when I wanted to quit.

Sometimes I didn't eat properly.
Sometimes I forgot to sleep.
Sometimes I didn't talk to my family for days because I was drowning in books and deadlines.

I began to understand why people say:
“Medical school tests your limits.”

Because it truly does.

The Support That Kept Me Alive

Whenever things became too heavy,
I called my mother.

She always said:

“Breathe, Emma.
You are stronger than you think.”

My father sent me encouraging messages like:
“Proud of you. Keep going.”

My brother made silly jokes
just to make me laugh.

Their support was the medicine that kept my heart strong.

Whenever I felt like I couldn't continue, their love reminded me why I started.

Small Moments That Felt Big

Even in the stress,
there were moments that felt magical:

- The first time I correctly identified a heartbeat
- The first patient who smiled at me
- The first senior doctor who said, “Good job, Emma.”
- The first exam I passed with flying colors
- The first time I helped a patient walk
- The first time I held a baby during delivery

Every small success felt like a piece of my dream coming true.

The Final Year — A Storm and a Sunrise

The final year of MBBS was the hardest.

Exams, assignments, hospital duties—everything felt like a storm.

Some days I was so tired that I couldn't even lift my pen.

But something inside me kept saying:

“Emma, you have come too far.
You cannot stop now.”

So I didn't.

And finally...
the day arrived.

I passed all my exams.
I completed my MBBS.

The moment I held my degree, tears filled my eyes.

I whispered to myself:

“You did it...
and it was worth every struggle.”

*The End of MBBS...

But the Beginning of My Life

MBBS didn't just teach me medicine.
It taught me patience, discipline,
strength,
and compassion.

It showed me how to fall,
how to stand again,
and how to keep walking even when the road is hard.

Today, I am a doctor.
But behind this title is a long journey
full of sweat, tears, fear, and courage.

And I would live it all again because it made me who I am.

MY SECOND DREAM — DUBAI

While I was working hard to become a doctor, there was another dream growing quietly inside my heart.
A dream that felt different—not heavy like my MBBS dream, but light, warm, and magical.

It was the dream of visiting Dubai.

I don't remember the exact moment this dream began, but I remember the first picture I ever saw—a tall, shining tower touching the sky.
It was the Burj Khalifa.

I stared at that picture for a long time.
The building looked unreal,
as if it belonged to another world.

I whispered to myself:

“One day, I want to stand there.”

Why Dubai?

Dubai, to me, was not just a city.
It was a symbol.

A symbol of dreams.
A symbol of light.
A symbol of possibility.

Where I lived in the UK, everything was soft and calm—green fields, quiet streets, small houses.

Dubai was the complete opposite—bright lights, tall buildings, fast life, luxury.

Maybe that's why I loved it.
It was everything my world was not.

Whenever I felt tired from studying,
I opened my phone and looked at pictures of Dubai's skyline.

The lights, the colors, the beauty—
they gave me energy.

It felt like the city was calling me.

The Poster on My Wall

When I was a teenager,
I printed a large picture of Burj Khalifa and placed it above my study desk.

Every morning when I woke up,
I saw that poster.
Every night before sleeping,
I saw that poster.

It became a reminder:

“Emma, you have two dreams—
one dream for your future, and one dream for your soul.”

Whenever medical school became too hard,
I looked at the poster and imagined myself standing on the top, looking at the world from above.

For a few seconds,
all my stress disappeared.

The Dream I Kept Secret

Unlike my first dream,

I didn't tell anyone about Dubai at first.

Why?

Because it felt personal.

Soft.

Delicate.

Something I wanted to protect.

I thought people would laugh.

They would say:

“Emma, you want to become a doctor AND visit Dubai?

Isn't that too much?”

So I kept the dream inside my heart.

But my mother eventually noticed.

Mothers always do.

One evening she came into my room and saw me staring at the Dubai poster.

She smiled and said:

“One day, Emma...

you will go there with your own hard work.”

Her words stayed with me like a blessing.

When Life Became Difficult

During MBBS,

when my father lost his job

and money became a big problem, my Dubai dream felt very far away.

Sometimes I looked at the poster and thought,

“Maybe this dream is impossible.
Maybe I should remove it.”

But I didn’t.
Because even in hard times,
that small dream gave me hope.

It reminded me that life could be beautiful,
that after struggles,
there could be light.

That little poster kept my spirit alive.

My First Salary — A Turning Point

After finishing medical school,
I got my first job in a hospital in London.

When I received my first salary,
I held the envelope in my hand and felt tears in my eyes.

Not because of the money—but because it meant freedom.

It meant possibilities.
It meant... Dubai was no longer just a dream.

That night,
I looked at the poster on my wall
and whispered:

“Soon.”

The Day I Booked My Ticket

Months passed.
I saved money carefully,
cut extra expenses,
worked extra shifts.

And finally...
one evening...
I sat in front of my laptop, opened a travel website,
and typed:

“London → Dubai”

When I clicked Book Now,
my hands were shaking.

I wasn't just buying a flight.
I was achieving a dream I had protected for many years.

I felt a strange mix of excitement and fear.
I thought:

“Emma... this is real.
You're going to Dubai.”

Landing in Dubai — A Dream in Real Life

When the plane landed and I stepped outside,
the warm air touched my face.

Dubai smelled different—a little like heat,
a little like luxury,
a little like magic.

The city was glowing.
Tall buildings surrounded me.
Lights danced everywhere.

I looked around and whispered:

My First Night in Dubai

That night,
I stood outside Dubai Mall and looked u
