

Many people ask me.

Zain...

“I understand English, but I can’t speak.”

If you feel the same, don’t worry.

You’re not alone.

Speaking English is not magic — it’s a skill.

And today, I’ll help you unlock it easily.

By the end of this video,

you’ll know why this happens and how you can start speaking English naturally — step by step.

Welcome back to easy English The Podcast,

Where you learn real English slowly clearly and confidently.

Okay

SECTION number 1 – Why You Can Understand But Can’t Speak.

Let’s understand something very important.

When you listen to English, your brain is relaxed.

It only needs to catch and recognize words.

You don’t need to create anything.

That’s why you can easily understand movies,

YouTube videos, or even English songs.

You hear the words —

and your brain says,

“Yes, I know this!”

But when it’s your turn to speak, everything changes.

Your brain suddenly has to work much faster.

It has to:

Find the right words,

Put them in the correct order,

And say them clearly — all at the same time!

That's a lot of work.

So your brain freezes.

Your mouth stays quiet.

And you think, “Why can't I speak?”

It's not because you're bad at English.

It's because you've only trained your ears, not your mouth.

Think about it like this —

You can watch football every day,

you understand the rules,

you know every player's name...

but if you go to the ground to play,

you won't play like them.

Because you've never practiced playing.

The same happens with English.

You've learned by listening and reading — that's called input.

But speaking needs output — using the language with your mouth and mind together.

Your brain understands English, but your tongue is not used to moving that way yet.

You know the words,
but they're stuck inside your head — waiting for practice to bring them out.

And here's the best part — this problem is normal.

Every English learner faces it.

Even native speakers of other languages go through this when learning English.

So the problem is not you.
The problem is the method.

You've trained your brain to understand English — now, we'll train your mouth to use English.

And it's easier than you think.

SECTION number 2 – this section is very important for you.

Now that you know why you can understand but can't speak, let's fix it — step by step.

You don't need big books.

You don't need hard grammar.

You just need small, daily practice.

Let's start simple.

Step number 1: Repeat what you hear

This is one of the most powerful ways to train your speaking.
It's called shadowing.

Here's how it works:

You listen to a short English clip — maybe one line from a movie, a podcast, or even a YouTube short.

Then, you repeat exactly what you hear — with the same sound, speed, and feeling.

For example,
if the clip says,

> “Hey, how are you doing today?”
you repeat right after it —
“Hey, how are you doing today?”

Don’t worry if it’s not perfect.
You’re not memorizing words;
you’re training your mouth.

This method helps your tongue move like an English speaker’s.
It teaches you rhythm, tone, and pronunciation — naturally.

Try doing this for just 5 minutes a day.
You’ll be surprised how quickly your speaking starts to sound better.

Step number 2: Speak short sentences daily

You don’t have to speak long, difficult sentences.
Start small.

Say things like:

“I’m eating lunch.”

“I’m watching TV.”

“I’m feeling sleepy.”

“I like this song.”

These short sentences might look simple, but they train your brain to think in English fast.

Say them out loud while you do your daily work.
While cooking, walking, or sitting — just talk to yourself in English.

Remember, small sentences every day are better than big grammar once a week.

Step number 3: Talk to yourself

Many learners feel shy or nervous to speak in front of others.
That’s okay.
You can practice alone — and it still counts!

Talk to yourself about your day.

For example:

“I woke up late today.”

“I made tea.”

“I’ll call my friend later.”

You can even pretend to talk to someone.
Ask and answer your own questions, like:

“How are you?”

“I’m fine, thank you.”

“What are you doing?”

“I’m studying English.”

The more you do this,
the more natural speaking will feel.

You don’t need an audience to practice.
You just need your voice.

Step number 4: Stop translating

This one is very important.
When you think in your native language and then translate to English, your brain becomes slow and confused.

You start thinking, “What’s the English word for that?”
and you lose your confidence.

So start with easy English thoughts.
For example:
Instead of thinking,
“Main paani peene ja raha hoon,”
just think,
“I’m going to drink water.”

Say it in English directly — even if it’s simple.
The goal is not perfect English.
The goal is direct thinking in English.
Step number 5: Don’t fear mistakes
This is the biggest rule of all.

If you wait until your English is perfect, you’ll never speak.

Mistakes mean you're trying.
And trying means you're improving.

Even native speakers say things like,
“I done it” instead of “I did it,”
or “He don't know” instead of “He doesn't know.”

So if they can make mistakes, why can't we?

Smile, laugh, and keep going.
Each mistake you make is a step toward fluency.

Step number 6: Make speaking part of your life

Don't treat English like a school subject.
Treat it like a friend you talk to every day.

Watch one English video daily — and speak along.
Say your grocery list in English.
Talk to your mirror in English.
Even think about your dreams in English.

The more English becomes part of your daily life, the faster you'll speak without fear.

SECTION number 3 – The Mindset You Need.

Now listen carefully — this part is very important.

Learning to speak English is not only about words, grammar, or accent.
It's also about your mindset —
the way you think about English.

Most people say,
“I’ll start speaking when my English is good.”
But the truth is — your English becomes good when you start speaking.

You don’t need to be perfect to start.
You need to start to become perfect.

Think about how babies learn to talk.
They don’t study grammar first.
They don’t know all the words.
They just try, every day.
They make mistakes,
they copy others,
they repeat again and again —
and slowly, they become fluent.

That’s how you learned your first language.
That’s how you’ll learn English too.

You don’t need a classroom.
You don’t need a big vocabulary.
You just need courage to try.

Many people feel scared when they speak English.
They think,
“What if I say it wrong?”
“What if people laugh at me?”
“What if I sound funny?”

But let me tell you something powerful:
Every person who speaks English fluently today was once afraid — just like you.

They made mistakes.

They forgot words.

They felt nervous.

But they didn't stop.

They kept speaking, again and again — until speaking became easy.

So, don't stop because of fear.

Fear is normal.

You just have to speak through it.

Confidence doesn't come first.

Speaking comes first.

Confidence comes after.

Imagine this:

You speak English for just one minute today.

Tomorrow, you do two minutes.

After one week, you speak for five minutes.

After one month, you speak freely.

That's how confidence grows — step by step.

And please remember — your accent doesn't matter.

Your grammar doesn't matter.

What matters is your message.

People want to understand you,
not judge your accent.

English is not only for British or American people.

It's for everyone — for you, for me, for the world.

So, speak your own version of English with pride.

If someone laughs at your English, that's their problem, not yours.
Because you're doing something amazing — you're learning a new language.
You're growing, improving, and getting stronger.

Be proud of that.
Even one English sentence a day is progress.
Even one new word is success.

So from today,
change the way you think about English.

Don't say,
"I can't speak."
Say,
"I'm learning to speak."

Don't say,
"My English is bad."
Say,
"My English is improving."

Small change in words,
big change in mindset.

Because the moment you believe you can speak,
you start speaking better.

So, now you know everything you need:
why you understand English but can't speak,
how to fix it,
and how to think with the right mindset.

Now it's time to take action.

Because learning English is not just about listening — it's about using it.

Every time you speak,
you're teaching your mouth and mind to work together.
Every sentence you say,
even a small one,
is a step forward.

Don't wait for "one day."
Start today.
Start small.

You don't need a big plan.
Just one simple habit:
Speak English for 5 minutes a day.

You can talk to yourself,
talk to your mirror,
record your voice,
or speak to a friend online.

It doesn't matter where or how.
What matters is — you speak.

And when you make mistakes — smile.
Mistakes are signs that you're learning something new.

Every time you make a mistake,
you're one step closer to fluency.

So never feel bad for trying.
Feel proud that you're improving.

You already understand English.
That's your superpower.
Now it's time to use that power.

English is not something you just study —
it's something you live.

Watch English videos,
read English stories,
think in English,
and speak — even when no one's listening.

Because every word you say builds your confidence.

And please don't compare yourself with others.
Everyone learns at their own speed.
Some people learn fast.
Some learn slow.
Both are fine —
because you're still moving forward.

Progress is progress, no matter how small.

So be kind to yourself.
Celebrate your small wins.
If you spoke one sentence today,
that's a win.
If you learned one new word,
that's a win too.

So from today, make a promise to yourself:

“I will speak English every day — even if it’s just for a few minutes.”

You don’t need to sound perfect.

You just need to sound like you.

Your English doesn’t need to be big.

It just needs to be brave.

If this video helped you,

click the like button — it really hel ps me reach more learners like you.

Share this video with a friend who understands English but can’t speak so they can start speaking too.

—

And don’t forget to subscribe for more simple, clear, and easy English lessons every week.

Because here, we don’t just learn English —

we live it.

Keep speaking,

keep smiling,

and keep believing in yourself.

You can do this — one word, one sentence, one day at a time.